

What do you tell others?

What do you tell others about your role as a speech language pathologist or an educational audiologist in the school setting?

Do you tell them..

- you impact the lives of children and families daily?
- you're able to teach fellow staff members by example?
- you have opportunities to see a variety of students while also working with their teachers to ensure interventions occur in all settings?
- you are critical to helping teachers and building administrators get the learning environment acoustically attuned?
- your day is never boring-you see children in individual sessions, group sessions, classroom settings, children with intense needs and children who just need some polishing?
- just when you think you're happy working with one age group you have an opportunity to work with and embrace other ages?
- you are part of a team of varied professionals all learning from each other, working together to do what's best for the children?
- you truly are a lifelong learner...opportunities abound for continuing education?
- all teachers wish you could come into their classrooms to teach weekly lessons?
- technology is an increasingly important part of your role?
- administrators rely on your knowledge and specialized expertise?
- you get offers for additional work? You can always work as little or as much as you desire? You and your expertise are in demand?
- you work your hardest nine months out of the year and look forward to your well deserved summer vacation?

You are a hard-working, energetic, creative professional who is passionate and good at what you do, but you can't do it alone. Project Inspire needs your help to continue to grow the profession. Please consider talking with high school students in your community about a future profession as a speech-language pathologist or educational audiologist. Project Inspire, sponsored by OMNIE, is offering honorariums as a thank you to those proposals selected. Proposals can be downloaded from www.omnie.org, we look forward to receiving your stirring, motivating, inspiring, and enthusiastic proposal. Don't dally.....the deadline to receive proposals is coming up soon.
